

Norland Educare Research Journal

An international journal on home-based childcare

Norland Educare Research Journal

N
NORLAND

An exciting new publication that exclusively focuses on issues pertaining to home-based educare

Grounded in the work of researchers and practitioners in the field, the Norland Educare Research Journal is intended to bring together existing research on home-based educare and, at the same time, encourage further knowledge production. Its scope is to challenge established early childhood discourses, practices and policies, and to construct situated knowledge on home-based educare that is of global relevance and local significance. The journal aims to provide multiple perspectives and alternative views, broadening the knowledge on home-based professional practices, policies and workforce training. We are particularly interested in disseminating learning stories co-constructed by practitioners, policymakers, researchers and caregivers. As we launch the journal, we wish to be aspirational, creative and innovative, while maintaining the rigour required in published research.

A call for experienced and new researchers

We are particularly interested in papers that convey thought leadership substantiated by rigorous and credible research and argumentation. We would like to hear from researchers whose field of expertise is under-represented in the field of educare and who wish to disseminate their research in a journal that has a distinct thematic focus on the interplay of care and education.

The journal is an international, double-blind peer-reviewed journal, published online only. It is an open access journal, offering free-of-charge publication to researchers and authors and free access to papers for readers. This is an in-house publication (published by Norland), which allows quick turnover in terms of reviewing and publishing peer-reviewed papers.

Call for papers

We have an ongoing open call for papers, and we are interested in proposals for special issues with a distinct thematic focus. If you are interested in submitting a paper or discussing a special issue, please contact journal@norland.ac.uk. To find out more, please visit norland.ac.uk/journal

